

ceed; 2700 would be even better. I would like to see it introduced with a precision-made jacketed bullet, the goal being a very high level of accuracy. The bullet jacket should be thin enough that the bullets explode on small varmints. Here, accuracy and bullet performance would be more important than low price.

In addition, I would like to see a line of less-expensive ammunition, possibly with a plated bullet, for plinking or casual shooting on a more limited budget. If a third type of ammunition is possible, it should produce good accuracy, but use a slower-expanding bullet for less destruction of edible small game.

The .17 Rimfire is a practical cartridge. Its light report makes it ideal for populated areas. It's ideal for sharpening the shooting eye, because it has the accuracy needed to make practice worthwhile. It's useful for varmints and small game, and is one top-notch round for furbearers and for called-in predators. It betters the range of the .22 Magnum by a considerable amount, and is a lot more accurate than the .22 Magnum in the rifles I've fired. Apparently, the firearms manufacturers are poised to go with it. What we need is a commitment from an ammunition manufacturer. If you want to own a .17 Rimfire, write to Federal, Winchester, and CCI. If they hear from enough of you, one of them is bound to see the future in the .17 Rimfire.

Lyman alone has the Auto-Flo™ Advantage

Shooters, especially volume reloaders, should take a look at Lyman's innovative Auto-Flo self-separating system. Available in 1200, 2200, and 3200 models, these Auto-Flo models allow for automatic separation of polishing and cleaning media from the bowl. Using the unit's normal agitating motion in a newly designed bowl with an exit port, media is quickly and conveniently removed, leaving the bowl full of cleaned and polished cases.

Buy a new Turbo Tumbler complete with the Auto-Flo system or try the right size conversion kit on your standard Turbo Tumbler. Note that it also works on most tumblers of similar design.

See your Lyman dealer today or write for full size 44-page color catalog (available for $2.00) or small 2-color version free. *Patent applied for.
